

I feel very strongly that the FCC should not implement any proposal that would lessen Indiana's Telephone Privacy law protections. Our evening family time has been quite measurably improved since the implementation of Indiana's law, of which we took immediate advantage. This would be a wonderful time for the federal government to mind their own business and let the states do what the states do best in this type of situation, which is do take the best interest of it's populace to heart. The situation Indiana has in this matter allows each family to decide for themselves what they want to do. What could be better than that? Certainly not the federal government telling us different, or that we must allow certain calls. Ridiculous! Leave well enough alone!
